DEVELOPMENT AND LIVING IN DIGNITY

Pawan Kumar¹

INTRODUCTION

Human rights now a days, ought to be respected and valued for their qualities and capacities, which completely define them as individuals with appropriate worth and value in society. However, there are times when such components of recognition are difficult to identify to just single individual. The beginning of the criteria by which a person gets firmly attached to is aimed toward the condition of making significant adjustments in who they are and how they spend their lives in order to be completely dignified in their methods and personal values and beliefs.

DIGNITY IN HUMAN RIGHTS

Dignity is sometimes referred to as a sense of reputation, which is defined as a person's identity based on how he wants to be known and what he does to ensure that his reputation seems acceptable to everyone else he wants to please. The degree of respect accorded to a person is frequently determined by the level of dignity he is able to build in society. Such matters are stressed on in relation to the works and specific living situations that one comes to accept. Helena Lacks, for example, is a regular lady who was diagnosed with cancer at the age of 30 while trying to care for her family.

However, in the process of making a significant impact on how her name has influenced the fields of classic and modern medicine, her life has been completely neglected in order to conduct research that will be able to define the most complex issues surrounding the cancer cells that were removed from her body and have served as a source of medical foundation for cancer research.

Skloot's book aims to restore Helena Lacks' dignity, which she appears to have lost as a result of the popularization of the cancer cell she found. On the other side, Lee and George say that dignity should be discovered in such a manner that it characterizes a person's ability to extend himself to others.

In some ways, this defines Lack's existence as well-defined, especially when it comes to becoming the source of proper views of cancer cell development and finding proper ways to treat the said medical problems, which makes Lacks a well-dignified individual. Lack's involvement in a case and her predicament being exploited for study, rather than being realistically cared for, is a clear distinction on how human dignity has been less appreciated for, as Keiger goes on to say. Nonetheless, Lee and George's reasoning suggests that her contributions to the medical sector have given her the opportunity to be well-known across the world today.

In this scenario, it's probable that she's been neglecting her life as a person rather than as a professional. Nonetheless, Lee and George's reasoning suggests that her contributions to the medical sector have given her the opportunity to be well-known across the world today. In this scenario, maybe ignoring her existence as a person rather than a patient is part of establishing her dignity, which is now generally accepted in the medical community. It's expected that being seen in this way will allow her to be discovered by others who are interested in her personal life.

CONCLUSION

Does Lee and George's explanation of what dignity is giving a description of what has become of modern society and how individuals understand dignity as an element of social growth? True, modernism and its methods have resulted in a lack of regard for values and respect. This can be seen in the presentations and provocative announcements on the Occupy Together, which are likely implying that modern society has neglected the choices of providing other individuals with the dignity that they deserve, particularly if such matters place them in a position of neglecting important matters such as the economy, politics, and even personal growth. The information compiled on this page, for example, serve as demonstrations of how the human mind works.

Does Lee and George's definition of dignity reflect what has become of modern society and how individuals view dignity as a component of social development? True, modernism and its tactics have resulted in a lack of respect and care for values. This can be seen in the presentations and provocative announcements on the Occupy Together, which are likely implying that modern society has neglected the choices of providing other individuals with the dignity that they deserve, particularly if such matters force them to ignore important issues like the economy, politics, and even personal growth.
